

ARCHIVED - Archiving Content

Archived Content

Information identified as archived is provided for reference, research or recordkeeping purposes. It is not subject to the Government of Canada Web Standards and has not been altered or updated since it was archived. Please contact us to request a format other than those available.

ARCHIVÉE - Contenu archivé

Contenu archivé

L'information dont il est indiqué qu'elle est archivée est fournie à des fins de référence, de recherche ou de tenue de documents. Elle n'est pas assujettie aux normes Web du gouvernement du Canada et elle n'a pas été modifiée ou mise à jour depuis son archivage. Pour obtenir cette information dans un autre format, veuillez communiquer avec nous.

This document is archival in nature and is intended for those who wish to consult archival documents made available from the collection of Public Safety Canada.

Some of these documents are available in only one official language. Translation, to be provided by Public Safety Canada, is available upon request.

Le présent document a une valeur archivistique et fait partie des documents d'archives rendus disponibles par Sécurité publique Canada à ceux qui souhaitent consulter ces documents issus de sa collection.

Certains de ces documents ne sont disponibles que dans une langue officielle. Sécurité publique Canada fournira une traduction sur demande.

Canada

THE YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

H I G H L I G H T S

KE
9445
.Z82
Y6
1986
c.2

Solicitor General
Canada

Solliciteur général
Canada

Ministry
Secretariat

Secrétariat
du Ministère

THE YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

KE
9445
.282
46
1986
0.2

H I G H L I G H T S

LIBRARY
MINISTRY OF THE SOLICITOR
GENERAL

JAN 16 1987

BIBLIOTHEQUE
MINISTÈRE DU SOLICITEUR GÉNÉRAL

© Minister of Supply and Services Canada 1986
Cat. No. JS 42-7/1986
ISBN 0-662-54818-3

Published under the authority of the Hon. James Kelleher,
Solicitor General of Canada

Produced by the Communications Group
Programs Branch
Ministry Secretariat

FOREWORD

In 1982, Parliament passed the Young Offenders Act, which came into force on April 2, 1984. This legislation replaced the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1908.

While the Juvenile Delinquents Act was innovative in its time, Canadian society had undergone great changes since its proclamation prior to the First World War. Those changes affected every aspect of our lives, notably, the ways in which we deal with crime and the role of children and youth in our communities. Many creative and positive developments in the actual day to day practices of the police, courts and correctional agencies dealing with young offenders occurred during those intervening years, but the law itself was increasingly out of step.

The Young Offenders Act, as the pages of this booklet demonstrate, is far more appropriate to modern Canadian needs. It was developed from almost a decade of study, consultation, and debate involving concerned citizens, police, lawyers, judges, youth serving agencies, and many others. The new law does not simply change a few legal procedures or refine some sentencing practices. Rather, it represents a fundamental shift in the philosophy and procedures of criminal law as applied to young persons involved in criminal acts. The Act fully recognizes the rights of young people, rights enshrined in the Bill of Rights and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms; it affirms the rights and interests of the victims of crime; and it acknowledges that society, as a whole, enjoys a fundamental right to protection from crime that cannot be set aside simply because the offender is a minor.

These principles have continued to receive the broad support of juvenile justice and community representatives, even though some of the Act's new procedures proved to be problematic. These difficulties required speedy resolution and, in June 1986, amendments to the Young Offenders Act were passed following close consultations with police, court officials, lawyers, provincial governments, other juvenile justice officials and concerned citizens.

The consultative process leading to amendments reinforced the fundamental importance of the principles of the Young Offenders Act. It also clearly emphasized the necessity of closely monitoring the impact of the Act on Canadians of all ages, be they offenders, victims or concerned citizens, and underlined the need for direct community involvement in juvenile justice services, programs and reforms.

As Solicitor General of Canada, I am committed to working toward the achievement of the goals of the Young Offenders Act in the interests of young people, victims and communities across Canada. I hope that the information contained in this booklet will contribute to a better understanding of the Act and the ongoing improvement of juvenile justice.

A handwritten signature in black ink that reads "James Kelleher". The signature is written in a cursive, flowing style.

James Kelleher
Solicitor General of Canada

Table of contents

Introduction: The need for reform	1
Questions and Answers:
1. When did the Young Offenders Act come into effect?	3
2. What approach to young offenders does the Act take?	4
3. To whom does the Act apply?	5
4. Will every young person who breaks a federal law appear in the youth court?	6
5. Once the authorities have decided to take a young person to court, what is the procedure and what rights does the young person have?	8
6. What happens to a young person if he or she is detained in custody before the youth court has given its decision?	9
7. Will the youth court deal with every young person who comes before it?	10
8. What sentences can the youth court give?	11
9. What does a "committal to custody" involve?	13
10. Can a young person appeal against the youth court's decision?	15
11. Can a sentence be changed once it has been given?	16
12. What happens if a young person does not abide by the disposition?	17
13. Are youth court hearings open to the public?	18
14. Can young people be identified on television and in newspapers?	18
15. Can the police fingerprint and photograph young people?	19

16. What happens to the records of a young person who has come into conflict with the law?	20
17. How can the community play a part in the administration of the Young Offenders Act ?	21
Conclusion: The role of the federal and provincial governments	22

INTRODUCTION: The need for reform

The Young Offenders Act is one of the most significant pieces of social policy legislation to have been passed in recent years. This Act represents a fundamental shift in philosophy in comparison to the 1908 Juvenile Delinquents Act and reflects more accurately than did its predecessor the needs and aspirations of Canadians of all ages.

At the turn of the century, laws provided little or no protection for children; they were victims of exploitation in the workplace; no laws assured even the most minimal education; and welfare services were inadequate or non-existent. A child who broke the law, regardless of his or her age and vulnerability, appeared in ordinary court and was dealt with at trial and sentencing much as an adult would be. The 1908 Juvenile Delinquents Act, revised in 1929, introduced what were then innovative concepts in the treatment of young offenders.

The Juvenile Delinquents Act was based upon the doctrine of parens patriae which established the state as a kindly parent who would deal with the young wrongdoer "not as a criminal but as a misdirected child" requiring "help and guidance and proper supervision." It further introduced the idea of delinquency as an all-encompassing offence and, in theory, no distinction was to be made between young people who violated criminal law or any other law, or who were involved in "sexual immorality or any similar form of vice." The juvenile authorities were to be concerned primarily with treating the needs of the "delinquent" and accordingly the Juvenile Delinquents Act provided for wide discretionary powers and great flexibility. The informality and flexibility permitted authorities, as kindly parents, to "treat" the child for as long as was necessary in order to "cure" the condition of delinquency regardless of the sort of crime or misbehaviour that had originally brought the child before the juvenile court.

The primary concern for the welfare of children upon which the Juvenile Delinquents Act was based represented a major advance in social policy. Years of experience and dramatic changes in Canadian society have shown the 1908 Act to be inadequate, even inappropriate, to contemporary needs and circumstances. The informality and flexibility that are the hallmarks of the Juvenile Delinquents Act are now recognized to be arbitrary and lacking sufficient safeguards against the infringement of the basic rights which must be accorded to all citizens, regardless of age.

The Act had the regrettable effect of criminalizing children for conduct that did not constitute a crime for adults. Important questions, such as a young person's rights to due process, including his or her entitlement to legal representation, the authority of police to fingerprint juveniles and the use of juvenile court records, had been left unanswered by the Juvenile Delinquents Act. Further, the system of open-ended sentences meant that a young offender could be given a more severe sentence than an adult would receive for the same offence.

The Young Offenders Act is based on completely different principles. The Act embodies a rights and responsibilities approach to young people in trouble with the law. On the one hand, it emphasizes that young people must bear responsibility for their illegal behaviour, and that society has a right to necessary protection from such behaviour. On the other hand, it recognizes that young people have special needs and should not always be held accountable in the same manner or suffer the same consequences as adults because they are dependents at varying degrees of development and maturity. In view of society's right to protection, and the special needs of young people, they not only require supervision, discipline and control, but must also be given guidance, assistance and special protection for their basic rights.

The Act establishes a system of youth courts, procedures and dispositions which is separate from that established for adults, but which provides for the same basic rights as are afforded adults, with special safeguards and guarantees to protect young persons. In addition to its recognition of the special needs and rights of young persons, the legislation incorporates into its provisions a concern for the victims of offences, the parents of young offenders and the safety and rights of the community as a whole.

Prior to its proclamation, some of the procedures and provisions of the Young Offenders Act were already in practice, in varying degrees, in different areas of the country. Juvenile court judges had been informing young people of their rights; legal aid clinics had been providing the opportunity for them to obtain legal representation; effective diversion programs had been developed, thereby avoiding unnecessary court appearances; and greater parental involvement had been encouraged. The passage of the Act acknowledged these advanced practices and recognized that the time had come for their implementation throughout Canada.

Built upon twenty years of public debate, consultations and discussions with the provinces and territories, professional and other interested groups and individuals, the Young Offenders Act represents an important consensus for a greatly strengthened system of justice for young people. The legislators have extended uniform standards throughout Canada and eliminated many inequities and anomalies that have existed for some time. In all, the Act constitutes an important achievement: from consultation, experimentation and consensus, it has developed a system of juvenile justice that is consistent and coherent, giving protection to both individuals and the communities throughout Canada.

PROCLAMATION DATE

1. When did the Young Offenders Act come into effect?

The Young Offenders Act was given Royal Assent on July 7, 1982. This signified that it had completed all stages of the parliamentary process. However, it did not come into effect immediately. An Act only becomes law when it has been proclaimed.

The Young Offenders Act was proclaimed on April 2, 1984. On proclamation, all the Act's provisions, except the one referring to maximum age, came into effect immediately.

The clause dealing with maximum age states that the Act covers young people up to the age of 17 inclusive. Since some provinces and both territories had to change their existing arrangements to accommodate this provision, the application of this clause did not become mandatory until April 1, 1985.

In April 1986, in response to difficulties that had been encountered during the first two years of the Act's administration, the Solicitor General of Canada introduced proposals for amendments to the Act. These proposals were given Royal Assent on June 27, 1986. These amendments have not altered the fundamental principles of the Act, but did introduce important and necessary improvements.

A NATIONAL POLICY FOR YOUNG OFFENDERS

2. What approach to young offenders does the Act take?

The philosophy of the Act is expressed in a policy section entitled "Declaration of Principle." This section serves as a guide to the Act's spirit and intent for everyone concerned with its administration throughout Canada.

The Act is based on four key principles that strike a balance between the needs of youthful individuals and the interests of society. These principles are:

- Young people are responsible for their behaviour and should be held accountable in a manner appropriate to their age and maturity.
- Society has a right to protection from illegal behaviour and a responsibility to prevent criminal conduct by young people.
- Young people have special needs because they are dependents at varying levels of development and maturity. In view of society's right to protection and these special needs, young people may not only require supervision, discipline and control but must also be given guidance and assistance. In recognition of this, the Act declares that:
 - alternative measures to the formal court process, or no measures at all, should be considered for the young offender, as long as such a solution is consistent with the protection of society;
 - young offenders should be removed from their families only when continued parental supervision is inappropriate. The Act recognizes the responsibility of parents for the care and supervision of their children. Parents will be encouraged and, if necessary, required to take an active part in proceedings that involve their children.
- Young people have the same rights as adults to due process of law and fair and equal treatment, including all the rights stated in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in the 1960 Bill of Rights. In order to protect their rights and freedoms, and, in view of their particular needs and circumstances, young people should have special rights and guarantees. On the following pages of this booklet the special rights and guarantees outlined in the Young Offenders Act are described. The Declaration of Principle at the beginning of the Act mentions in particular:
 - young people have the right to participate in deliberations that affect them;
 - young people have a right to the least interference with their freedom that is compatible with the protection of society, their own needs and their families' interests;
 - they have a right to be informed of their rights and freedoms.

JURISDICTION — BY OFFENCE AND AGE

3. To whom does the Act apply?

The Act covers only those young people charged with specific offences against the Criminal Code and other federal statutes and regulations. It does not apply to those charged with offences against provincial laws (which deal with offences such as traffic and liquor violations), or municipal by-laws. Provinces can, however, enact complementary legislation adopting the provisions of the Young Offenders Act to deal with such offences. The catch-all offence of "delinquency", created by the 1908 Juvenile Delinquents Act to cover all juvenile offences including the status offences of "sexual immorality" and "any similar form of vice", has been abolished. This means that young people no longer face the possibility of being criminalized for behaviour that is not illegal for an adult, and which can be dealt with more appropriately by child welfare, youth protection legislation and other forms of provincial legislation.

Under the Act the minimum age of criminal responsibility has been set at 12 years. If a younger child performs a harmful or criminal act, he or she can be dealt with under provincial laws, such as child welfare legislation. Those laws allow provincial authorities to intervene and, as necessary, have the issue of the proper care and custody of the child dealt with in a family court. This approach is very similar to past practices.

The Act stipulates that "'young person' means a person who is or... appears to be twelve years of age or more, but under eighteen years of age." This means that the Act covers individuals from their twelfth birthday until they are seventeen years inclusive; once they have attained their eighteenth birthday, they become adults from the point of view of the criminal law and move into the ordinary court system.

The establishment of a uniform maximum age across the country was a contentious issue during the development of this Act. Under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, the maximum age for juvenile delinquency varied from province to province: Quebec and Manitoba had under 18 years as their maximum; British Columbia (and Newfoundland which had its own statute to deal with young people) had under 17; the remaining six provinces and two territories had a maximum age of under 16.

While there was almost universal support for the need to establish a uniform maximum age, it was much more difficult to agree at what level that age should be set. The choice of different maximum ages reflected not only different opinions on when an individual is considered sufficiently mature to be held fully responsible and dealt with as an adult, but also the valuable variety of programs and resources that the provinces had developed to meet the needs of young offenders.

After much discussion and debate, the House of Commons adopted a uniform maximum age of 17 years inclusive.

ALTERNATIVE MEASURES

4. Will every young person who breaks a federal law appear in the youth court?

Not necessarily. One of the innovative provisions of the Act is the recognition that, for less serious offences, alternative measures to the formal court process might be used. It has been recognized for some time that many young people are brought to court unnecessarily, when other effective ways already exist or can be devised to deal with them.

In some cases, the police or other authorities may consider that taking no formal measures at all is the best way to deal with a young person. Police discretion has been a fundamental cornerstone in the administration of justice in this country for years.

In other cases, the authorities may choose alternative measures to the formal court proceedings. These alternative measures, commonly known as diversion programs, may entail community service, involvement in special education programs, counselling or restitution agreements. The Act sanctions such practices in law, but does not prescribe a particular model or mechanism. Individual provinces can develop the programs to suit their particular circumstances.

Alternative measures are not a substitute for the judicial process but additional options for dealing with young people who break the law. They are intended not only to avoid unnecessary referral to the court but also to offer a young person the opportunity to accept responsibility for his or her behaviour and to become involved in the reparation of his or her wrongdoing, frequently for the benefit of and with the participation of the victim.

It is the intent of the legislation that the informality of alternative measures will not prejudice the basic legal rights of young people, or their equitable treatment. Therefore, the Act contains built-in safeguards for the protection of young people who enter these programs. In particular:

- The young person must have accepted responsibility for the offence that has been committed.
- He or she must be fully informed about the alternative measures program and have voluntarily agreed to participate in it.
- He or she has the right to consult legal counsel before agreeing to enter an alternative measures program.
- The young person may prefer to have any charge dealt with by the court.
- Alternative measures cannot be used in any case unless there exists sufficient evidence to justify the prosecution of the case.
- Any admission of guilt that the young person has made cannot be used in evidence in subsequent court proceedings.

- Young people should not be punished twice for the same offence. Once an offender has fully completed an alternative measures program, the charge cannot subsequently be dealt with in the youth court and it will be dismissed. Where there has been compliance in part, the youth court judge is given the power to dismiss the charge if it is felt that a subsequent prosecution would be unfair. And where a subsequent prosecution is allowed, the young person's participation in an alternative measures program may be taken into account by the youth court judge in making a disposition.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE YOUTH COURT

5. Once the authorities have decided to take a young person to court, what is the procedure and what rights does the young person have?

The Act establishes strict guidelines on procedures. The young person's rights from the moment he or she has been arrested or summoned, the safeguards on these rights, and the special procedures that have been developed to answer young people's special needs are made explicit. Some of the rights, safeguards and special procedures enumerated in the Act are:

- The young person's parents must be notified of all proceedings, and encouraged or, if necessary, ordered to attend. Where their child has been found guilty, they will be allowed to make known their views prior to the court's sentence.
- The young person has a right to legal representation if proceedings are taken against him or her.
- Access to legal counsel is guaranteed at crucial stages of proceedings, including during a trial, a review of a disposition or a transfer to adult court, if the young person is unable to find a lawyer for him or herself. The law is also clear that young persons themselves, not their parents or other adults, give instructions to the lawyer.
- Young people must be informed of their particular rights at particular stages of proceedings. For instance, police officers must tell them their rights on arrest when they apprehend them, and youth court judges must tell them their rights in court when they appear before them.
- Before making a decision, the judge may ask for a pre-disposition report. This is an assessment of the young person's circumstances, including age, behaviour, previous brushes with the law, any experience in alternative measures programs, school records and relationship with parents, and an appraisal of the programs and facilities available to the court to meet the young person's needs. The young person, his or her parents, and the victim in the case will all be interviewed for the report. The judge must ask for a pre-disposition report if he or she is considering the transfer of the young person to an adult court. A report is also necessary when a sentence involving custody is being considered, although this requirement can be waived if all parties, including the judge, agree that a report would not be useful.
- If the judge considers that the young person is suffering from a physical or mental illness or disorder, a psychological disorder, an emotional disturbance, a learning disability or mental retardation, he or she can ask for a medical, psychological, psychiatric or similar assessment.

DETENTION AND BAIL

6. What happens to a young person if he or she is detained in custody before the youth court has given its decision?

The Act defines a precise procedure which police and court authorities must follow when they are considering the detention of a young person.

In particular:

- Young offenders have the same entitlement to bail as adult offenders. The youth court will deal with bail applications for young people, using the rules and criteria that are set out in the Criminal Code.
- The young person's parents must be notified.
- Young people must, as a general rule, be detained separately from adult offenders.
- The youth court will have the power to release a young person into the care of a responsible adult when it appears that the adult can exercise control and guarantee the young person's subsequent attendance in court.
- Young persons released on bail or in the custody of a responsible adult can be returned to detention if the conditions of release are not followed.

TRANSFER TO ADULT COURT

7. Will the youth court deal with every young person who comes before it?

Not necessarily. The Act is expected to be effective in nearly all cases. However, there will be occasions when the protection of society requires that an offender be dealt with more severely than a youth court is empowered to act. Nevertheless, the young person's special needs will always be taken into account as well.

Such an occasion can only arise when the young person has passed his or her fourteenth birthday and is alleged to have committed a serious indictable offence (for example, breaking and entering, manslaughter, armed robbery or sexual assault).

The Act provides criteria to guide youth court judges in deciding whether to transfer cases to adult court. In each case the judge must consider such factors as the degree of seriousness of the alleged offence, the young person's maturity and character, whether he or she had committed previous offences, and what treatment or correctional resources are available. The judge must take into account a pre-disposition report and any representation the parents make before authorizing a transfer. The decision to transfer a young person from the youth court to the adult court must be made before any decision is made on the guilt or innocence of the young person.

Transfer to the adult court has serious consequences. Not only is the trial held in adult court, but the young person is then subject to the range of sentences available to the adult court, which may be more severe: maximum sentences in the adult court range from six months to life imprisonment. He or she will not have the benefit of the special safeguards developed for young offenders, such as the review procedures. In view of its serious consequences, a transfer to adult court is considered to be a measure of last resort, for cases where it is the only way to protect society. The transfer order is subject to appeal.

In the majority of cases, application for transfer to the adult court will be made by the Crown. But the young person also has the right to apply for a transfer. In such cases, the youth court judge will still decide on the same criteria: whether such a transfer is consistent with the protection of society and the young person's special needs.

DISPOSITIONS

8. What sentences can the youth court give?

The range of dispositions (as youth court sentences are called) provided under the Act is wide, flexible and precisely defined. None of the dispositions are open-ended, in contrast to those in the 1908 Act which allowed young people to be put in custody for indeterminate periods. The sentencing options in the Act are intended to allow the youth court judge to take into account the special circumstances and needs of young people, the rights and needs of victims of crime and the need to protect society.

The dispositions available are:

- an absolute discharge;
- a fine of up to $1,000;
- a payment to the victim of the offence, in compensation for loss or damage to property, loss of income, or special damages that arose because of personal injury to the victim. A judge who is considering such an order will take into account the present and future potential of the offender to pay and also the views of the victim;
- an order of compensation in kind or by way of personal service to the victim of the offence. A judge who is considering such an order must, once again, consider the views of the victim;
- a community service order, which would require the young offender to perform a specified amount of work for the community;
- if a medical or psychological report recommends that the young person undergo treatment, the young person may be detained for treatment in a hospital or other appropriate facility as long as he or she agrees to this;
- probation for up to two years;
- committal to intermittent or continuous custody for a specified period. Under the Young Offenders Act, committal to custody is to be exercised with the utmost restraint, since it is a radical restriction of a young person's freedom. Custodial dispositions may not, for most offences, exceed two years in duration for any given offence. A young offender may, however, receive up to three years in custody if he or she is being sentenced for an offence for which an adult offender would be liable to life imprisonment, or if he or she is being sentenced for a combination of two or more offences;
- any additional conditions that the judge considers are in the best interests of society or the young offender, such as the surrender of illegal goods or a prohibition against the possession of firearms;
- any combination of these dispositions, so long as the combination does not exceed the stated maximum of two years for one offence (or the three year maximum for more serious offences), or three years for two or more offences;

— consecutive sentences totalling more than three years when a young person commits a subsequent offence while still subject to an earlier sentence.

In no case would a young person be subject to a greater penalty than the maximum penalty that an adult could receive for committing the same offence.

COMMITTAL TO CUSTODY

9. What does a “committal to custody” involve?

A “committal to custody” means that the young offender will be admitted to a specially designated residential facility from which his or her access to the community is restricted.

When the youth court commits a young person to custody, it must specify whether it intends the offender to enter “open” or “secure” custody. “Open” custody means admission to places like community residential centres, group homes, childcare institutions or forest and wilderness camps. “Secure” custody means admission to facilities specially designated for the secure containment or restraint of young offenders. This containment and restraint may take the form of either physical barriers or twenty-four hour supervision.

The youth court judge must, in the great majority of cases, consider a pre-disposition report before committing an offender to either level of custody. Custodial dispositions will only be given after very careful consideration and, because they represent a radical restriction of a young person’s freedom, are only to be ordered when it is necessary for the protection of society. Open custody will be ordered wherever possible; secure custody is a measure of last resort. The Act outlines specific conditions for committals to secure custody. The offence must be very serious and in most cases the offender must be over 14 years of age. Even more restrictive criteria must be met before a young person under 14 is committed to secure custody.

Once the youth court has made a custody order and specified the level of custody, the provincial director will decide which facility within that level the young offender will enter. The provincial director is also empowered to move offenders between institutions and programs within a given level, to order a temporary release to the community and to revoke such an order, to initiate the process that can lead to the offender’s early release from custody, and to transfer an offender from open to secure custody for up to fifteen days if the young person tries to escape or the safety of the young person or others is threatened.

The Act allows for two types of temporary release:

- A temporary leave of absence, up to a maximum of fifteen days for medical or humanitarian reasons, or to assist in the reintegration of the young offender into the community.
- A day release so the young person might attend school or training, continue employment or take part in a self-improvement program.

The young offender is, however, subject to the jurisdiction of the youth court throughout his or her disposition. Under the Act, provincial authorities cannot unilaterally alter the youth court’s decision concerning the young offender’s disposition, as they could under the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Therefore, if a provincial director wants to change the young offender's level of custody from secure to open, he or she can only do so with written authorization from the youth court. If the director wants to transfer an offender to an adult facility, because the offender has passed his or her eighteenth birthday, the director must apply to the court for a hearing; only the youth court can authorize such a transfer. Although either the director or a review board may recommend that a young offender be allowed to serve the balance of a custodial disposition in the community, only the youth court itself can effect an early release or set the conditions of release — that is, the terms of probation.

The provisions of the Act that deal with custody, and the relative responsibilities of the youth court and of the provincial directors, have one important underlying principle: the judiciary should ultimately decide on issues that affect the liberty of a young person and the protection of society. However, the Act is intended to give provincial directors enough flexibility to address the special needs of young people within the context of the provinces' programs and facilities.

APPEALS

10. Can a young person appeal against the youth court's decision?

Yes. Under the Act, young people will have similar rights of appeal from decisions that affect them as adults do under the Criminal Code. This is in contrast to the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which specifically denied young people the automatic right to appeal.

A young person can appeal a finding of guilty or the disposition that a youth court judge orders. However, he or she cannot appeal a subsequent adjustment to the disposition, made during the review process, unless the review was occasioned by a wilful failure or refusal to comply with the disposition on the young offender's part. (These are the only circumstances in which a disposition may be made more severe.)

A decision to transfer to adult court may also be appealed.

It should be noted that the Crown has corresponding rights of appeal.

REVIEW OF DISPOSITIONS

11. Can a sentence be changed once it has been given?

Yes, but only by the youth court. The Act outlines an innovative and thorough review procedure to ensure that each disposition is monitored at regular intervals. The procedure has three main objectives:

- To keep the disposition relevant and geared to the circumstances and progress of the young offender.
- To give everyone involved — the offender, the parents, the provincial director and the Attorney General — the opportunity not only to initiate a review, but also to attend and be heard.
- To protect both the rights of the young person and the interest of society while retaining jurisdiction within the court.

The Juvenile Delinquents Act contained provisions for a review system that, in practice, had largely been used only when the offender failed to comply with the court's disposition. The review system in the Young Offenders Act, in contrast, is meant to have a much more positive purpose: it allows the courts to modify a disposition to reflect progress made by the young person, new program opportunities that become available after a disposition is made or other changes in circumstances.

The Act describes the review system, and the rights and responsibilities of all those involved, very thoroughly.

Where there are sufficient grounds, custodial dispositions may be reviewed on application of any of those involved in the case. A young offender who has been committed to custody for more than a year will have a mandatory review at least every year. The review will be conducted either by the youth court or, at the option of the province, by a provincially-appointed review board. The judge or review board will take into account a report on the young offender's progress, any new facilities and programs that were not available when the original disposition was made, and any other relevant facts. The young person has the right to legal representation at this hearing. The youth court judge or review board may decide at the review to confirm the original disposition, move the offender from secure to open custody or to release the offender from custody and put him or her on probation.

All non-custodial dispositions will be reviewed by the youth court judge. These reviews may be arranged at the request of the provincial director, the young offender, his or her parents or the Crown prosecutor. During the review the court may confirm the original disposition or amend the terms of the disposition; the judge may not make it more severe unless the young person agrees.

12. What happens if a young person does not abide by the disposition?

If a young offender has either wilfully failed or refused to comply with a disposition, escaped or tried to escape from custody, the youth can be charged and tried with a specific criminal offence, and new and consecutive dispositions may then be imposed.

PUBLIC HEARINGS

13. Are youth court hearings open to the public?

Yes. The Act opens up youth court hearings, so that justice will not only be done but will also be seen to be done.

Open hearings ensure public scrutiny and monitoring of the youth court system, and are more in the spirit of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The public scrutiny should in turn provide an added guarantee for the protection of young people's rights. However, the judge will have the authority to exclude anyone:

- When the exclusion is in the interests of public morals, the maintenance of order or the proper administration of justice.
- When information being presented to the court would be "seriously injurious" or "seriously prejudicial" to any young person or child present, whether he or she is the accused, the victim or a witness.

14. Can young people be identified on television and in newspapers?

Although details of an offence or a trial can be reported, the news media have to respect the anonymity of any young person involved, whether he or she is the accused, the victim or the witness. There are, however, two exceptions to this limitation on the publication of identities:

- The identity of a young person who poses a danger to the public, when public assistance would aid in his or her apprehension and where a peace officer makes an application.
- The identity of an accused young person or of a young person or child who is a victim or witness, upon the request of the person to be identified.

FINGERPRINTS AND PHOTOGRAPHS

15. Can the police fingerprint and photograph young people?

Yes, but only with certain safeguards and when serious cases like breaking and entering or theft are being investigated. A young person may be fingerprinted or photographed only in those circumstances in which an adult can legally be subjected to such procedures.

The question of whether police may fingerprint and photograph young people has never been clearly answered in law up to now. The Juvenile Delinquents Act was silent on the issue, and the courts have delivered conflicting decisions. The Young Offenders Act permits the practice because it recognizes the need for this information in the detection and investigation of crime, but it specifies that use of this information must be primarily limited to criminal justice purposes.

Any photographs or fingerprint records can never again be used for any purpose if a young person is acquitted, the charge is dismissed, or no proceedings are taken against him or her. This applies to cases where the young people have entered alternative measures programs. The fingerprints and photographs of young offenders who are convicted in court may be kept with the youth court records and at the central repository administered by the RCMP. The police force responsible for the investigation may also keep a copy.

YOUTH COURT RECORDS

16. What happens to the records of a young person who has come into conflict with the law?

Although young offenders are intended to take responsibility for their illegal behaviour, the consequences for them are not intended to be as severe as those for adults in the ordinary court. Therefore, the Act contains very specific provisions dealing with the creation, maintenance, confidentiality and use of young people's records.

First, where a young person is charged with an offence and is either acquitted or the charge is dismissed, withdrawn or stayed and no proceedings are taken, all records, including fingerprints and photographs, are treated as if they do not exist and cannot be used for any purpose at all. The same rule applies to the records of young people who are found guilty by the youth court when a qualifying period of time has elapsed. The qualifying crime-free period specified in the Act will be five years from the date of conviction for summary conviction offences (offences that ordinarily carry a maximum of six months imprisonment under the Criminal Code) and five years from the end of the sentence for those who have committed the more serious offences known as indictable offences. Records of indictable offences will continue to be used if the individual is convicted of further indictable offences.

As a general rule, disclosure of records is prohibited except for specified purposes. Unauthorized disclosure by anyone is an offence. The Act specifies the purposes for which the records may be used. These purposes include bail or parole applications, subsequent sentencing in either the youth or the ordinary courts, and for research or statistical projects if the judge is satisfied that disclosure is desirable in the public interests.

The Act specifies the procedure for the storage, control of and access to young offenders' records. The people who may be allowed access to records are specified in the Act or in lists that are approved by the Lieutenant-Governor.

Under these provisions, young offenders will be given a fresh start when they have shown it is deserved. The provisions are intended to minimize the risk that young people will be stigmatized as "offenders" well beyond their youth if not for life, as they frequently were under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. The effect of these provisions is that there will be "in law" no conviction against the young person after the crime-free period: he or she will not face all the disabilities that flow from having a criminal record.

YOUTH JUSTICE COMMITTEES

17. How can the community play a part in the administration of the Young Offenders Act?

The Act provides for the establishment of Youth Justice Committees through which interested parties can participate in the juvenile system.

The Act specifies that in each province the Attorney General or any other Cabinet Minister designated by the province may establish such committees. The Minister, or anyone named as delegate (for example, the provincial director), may decide how the committee members are selected and what the committees will do. The method of selection could include election by members of the community. Committee members serve without pay. They can assist in any aspect of the administration of the Young Offenders Act, such as suggesting and monitoring alternative measures programs or community-based dispositions and participating in their actual administration.

The community will now have much wider opportunities for involvement in the juvenile justice system than it had through the Juvenile Court Committees provided by the Juvenile Delinquents Act. In the past, the Juvenile Court Committees tended to be confined to watchdog functions. The new Youth Justice Committee, in contrast, can play a role in crime prevention, the protection of society and in the safeguarding of the newly-guaranteed rights of young people.

CONCLUSION: The role of the federal and provincial governments

The federal and provincial governments share an important responsibility towards young people who come into conflict with the law. They are equally responsible for efforts to discourage young people from crime, and to direct them towards useful and productive lives. In addition, both levels of government are responsible for the protection of society.

The juvenile justice system, of which the Young Offenders Act is the foundation, is the mechanism by which the two levels of government fulfill their dual responsibilities. Within the system, each level of government has its own role.

The Government of Canada is responsible for enacting criminal law. It is also responsible for assuring the same opportunities for justice and legal rights to young people wherever they live, and for promoting national standards for programs developed to meet the needs of young offenders. The sanction of alternative measures, the provision of proper safeguards for their application, and the prescription of a uniform maximum age for all young people dealt with under the Act are three examples of the way that the federal government fulfills its obligation.

Parliament has, with this legislation, created the framework of the juvenile justice system. Within this framework the provincial governments have an equally important role. They are responsible for administering the law that Parliament enacts. It is the various professionals, such as family and youth court judges, lawyers, police officers, juvenile correctional officers, and social workers who make the system work. The fact that it is the provinces which administer juvenile justice allows the system to reflect regional and cultural differences, for instance in the range of services and programs offered, both for alternative measures and for youth court dispositions.

Young people are our future. With the proclamation of the Young Offenders Act, they are guaranteed the same rights to justice under the criminal law as other Canadians and provided with a greater opportunity to feel that they are members of their communities.

